and the n -th layer, the dielectric constants of each of the n , k and l sites lie in the range of between 3 and 15. Since the optical waveguide device of the present invention comprises a core layer and a clad layer on a substrate, or a substrate having the layers laminated on a core layer, the larger the difference between refractive indices of the core layer and the clad layer, the more the output of the waveguide is affected by the mode of the waveguide, as a result, the device can be operated with a high Q value (light in the waveguide becomes stable). For example, when the difference between refractive indices of the core layer and the clad layer is not larger than 0.5%, the output of the waveguide is close to that of the fundamental mode of the waveguide. When the difference between refractive indices of the core layer and the clad layer is not larger than 1%, a two-mode (LP x_{cex1} , LP x_{cex2}) waveguide is obtained. Further, when the difference between refractive indices of the core layer and the clad layer is not larger than 4%, a multimode (LP 1, LP 2) waveguide is obtained. The difference between refractive indices of the core layer and the clad layer is defined by: $(2n_x e^{2x_{88x923}})j_{xcex}/4$, wherein, n is a refractive index of the core layer or clad layer and j is the smallest integer satisfying 0.5 greater than $(2j_x e^{2x_{88x923}})x_{cex}/(4n)$. When the difference between refractive indices of the core layer and the clad layer is not larger than 0.5%, the difference is close to 1%. Further, when the difference between refractive indices of the core layer and the clad layer is not larger than 1%, a two-mode (LP x_{cex1} , LP x_{cex2}) waveguide is obtained. When the difference between refractive indices of the core layer and the clad layer is not larger than 4%, a multimode (LP 1, LP 2) waveguide is obtained. In the present invention, the addition of suitable amounts of Ge is effective for giving improved refractive indices of the core layer or clad layer. When adding Ge in amounts of 50 ppm to 4%, the refractive indices of the core layer or clad layer are increased to 20% to 30

In 1992, EPA conducted a National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health (NIOSH)-sponsored survey of EPA staff and contractors' knowledge of and use of the Internet. A follow-up survey was conducted in 1996-97. To identify and describe Internet-based environmental toxicology resources, EPA staff and contractors were queried in 1996-97 by means of a confidential Web-based survey and by an agency-wide Internet mailing list of members of the Senior Environmental Protection Division. There was a one-year interval between the two surveys. The response rates for the survey and the mailing list were 88 and 93%, respectively. Respondents reported that they access the Internet primarily for career information, to order materials, and to conduct journal searches. They reported, however, little use of Internet applications that provide environmental toxicology information, such as interactive teaching tools and electronic alerts. There was a significant increase in the number of respondents who had no access to the Internet because of a change in job title, a move to a new office or facility, or the shutting down of a computer server. This survey indicates that EPA uses the Internet primarily to order materials and to conduct journal searches. Public access to environmental toxicology information, a service that EPA has provided to its staff and contractors for many years, remains under-used by this population of users. Grades will be used in a number of areas to promote efficiency and effectiveness. They will be posted in staff meetings and email notifications to both staff and parents. Grades that are below 80 will be treated as a course with a grade of 80 to 90. At the end of the term, an average will be calculated and a weighted average will be calculated. Grades in literature will be treated as a grade of 60 to 72 and grades on other criteria will be treated as a grade of 40 to
