Dried blood spot (DBS) sampling is increasingly utilized for cortisol screening in emergency departments (EDs). However, the stability of cortisol in DBS samples for testing has not been assessed with repeated sampling in a time-limited fashion. We measured concentrations of cortisol in DBS samples stored for 30 days at -20 degrees C, -80 degrees C, and room temperature and compared them to serum cortisol values for four samples drawn on consecutive days from each subject. The correlation between DBS and serum cortisol was strong for both samples taken within 7 days of each other (n = 90, r = 0.97) and for samples taken more than 7 days apart (n = 80, r = 0.93). The effect
