Notepad was designed for Windows Vista and later operating systems. Q: Why do different cultures describe happiness in different ways? I understand the term "happiness" is not used often in science or linguistics. What I don't understand is how different cultures could use the same term to mean completely different things. From the perspective of psychology, happiness is a negative feeling, or at least a feeling that is more focussed on the negative. If you follow that definition, most cultures would be happier when they are pessimistic, since pessimism is the exact opposite of happiness. (Perhaps that explains why people who have more time to study seem more depressed than busy people.) However, most people wouldn't say they are less happy when they are more positive. For example, I don't think the French would say that they are happier when they are optimistic about their future, compared to people from less optimistic cultures. So why does a culture that is more positive about the future than others, choose to describe happiness in a different way? A: The best approach in science is to apply a single, simple definition to each and every phenomenon, and see if it adequately explains the observed results. Then we can start with the simplest explanation: To begin with, there are many different theories regarding happiness. However, for the sake of simplicity, I will limit myself to the following two popular ideas:

Happiness is a feeling and a consequential variable. Happiness can be seen as a good feeling which makes you fulfilled. The person is more happy when he/she feels satisfied with his/her life. Happiness is the result of pursuing valuable objectives. Happiness is the consequence of pursuing important goals. The person is happy when he/she pursues meaningful goals in life. According to the first theory, happiness is a negative feeling and pessimism is the most significant indicator. This theory is also called hedonism and can be presented by the sentence: All we know is how to get happiness; everything else is just a distraction. In this context, happiness can be considered as a more generalized representation of a positive affect
