Autism spectrum disorders are defined by marked social deficits, verbal and non-verbal communication problems, and restricted and repetitive behaviour with onset usually before 3 years of age. At the genetic, neurochemical and behavioural level, these disorders share a common pathophysiology, based on disruption of early functional and structural connectivity associated with neuroinflammation. Here, we explore the relationship between neuroinflammation and early learning deficits in autism. We performed the largest study to date of cytokines and chemokines that have been implicated in neurodevelopment and neuroinflammation in autism. We measured their expression in sera from 87 autistic children and 27 matched controls. Associations between concentrations of several cytokines and chemokines and the severity of early learning deficits as well as clinical features were identified by non-parametric tests. We identified a positive correlation between early learning deficits and strong expression levels of IL-1alpha, IL-6 and IL-8 in the sera of autistic children. Furthermore, we observed a negative correlation between the percentage of children with normal cognitive and language skills and high expression levels of IL-6. Interestingly, the majority of our autistic children also had no or minor gastrointestinal dysfunction. Our results suggest that disruption of neuroinflammation might be involved in the early cognitive and language deficits of autism. Autism Res 2019. © 2019 International Society for Autism Research, Wiley Periodicals, Inc. LAY SUMMARY: We found that people with autism have higher levels of cytokines, chemokines and pro-inflammatory signalling proteins in the blood than normal individuals. One of the most common symptoms of autism is not understanding words and we show for the first time that children with autism have lower levels of inflammation in the brain, compared to typically developing children, explaining some of their learning problems.Optimal management of gallstone pancreatitis. Although the incidence of gallstone pancreatitis has more than doubled in the past decade, there is a perceived paucity of
