A: You can either load the process into a designated zone or thread, or use process affinity locking. Assign the process to a particular zone or thread: The command line utility tasklist /v does this by design. You can force a process to only run in one particular thread: The Create Environment - Process Threading guide explains how. Use process affinity locking. This will force all threads for a given process to run only on a single CPU core. On Windows Server 2008 and above, you can use the Win32_Processor API method: SetThreadAffinityMask. On Windows Server 2012 and above, you can use the SetProcessAffinityMask API method. Note that for Windows Server 2012 and above, there is no corresponding method for GetThreadAffinityMask. A: No. The OS simply doesn't allow that. You are dealing with hardware that has only one core. If you want all cores to be
