Eco is designed for kids and grown-ups alike. As players explore the world, they play a side-scrolling game that involves managing their inventory of crafts in order to survive. Each time a player completes a craft, he gains experience and new skills. The player can put the skill points he gains to use in the game's adventure, as well as earn a small income by designing and selling his own artwork, using the points to buy extra items, and finding better items in the world. What sets Eco apart from other games is its focus on the ways that humans influence the environment, whether it is through changes to the energy system, to water and air quality, to food production and transport, or to building more structures such as cities. Eco provides players with a range of options for playing, including: For adult players: — Making their own designs using the skill points they've earned; — Creating their own eco system by building and modifying an eco system; — Asking the players to complete tasks in their eco system; — Playing as nature's population by choosing which creatures will live in the eco system. Players can also play as predators, and defend their eco system by attacking the population of other eco systems. For children: — Developing their own eco system by building and modifying their own eco system, and experiencing the changes in their eco system. — Taking the role of nature's population by choosing which creatures will live in the eco system, and encountering predators. About the Creators Eco is the world's first educational game to use game design principles to explore the way that humans affect the world's environment, and to introduce players to those effects through play, exploration, and discovery. What's new:

Episode one of the Puppet of Tera takes place on a dark night in Szczytno, Poland. It is one week until Christmas Eve and the priest, Franciszek, is on his way to the midnight Mass. A woman is waiting at the side of the road with an unusual suitcase, the very same suitcase that brought an old man to the town one year earlier. After a brief discussion with Franciszek, she accepts his help and climbs into the back of the truck. As the truck pulls away, the priest is puzzled, but sees the woman gives him a meaningful look from her window. The truck struggles through the icy winter weather, crossing the fields and wooden trestles in a shambles of snow. The cold air chills the passengers, but the stranger is utterly insouciant as she chats to the truck driver, Tomasz, and flirts with Tomasz's cousin, Zenek. (The crew notes that this conversation happens at about the 3:05 mark). Tomasz is wary, but begins to listen carefully to his friend's stories from the former Soviet Union. The stranger seems to know the story well enough to hum along and even recite some of it; her delivery is accentless and passionless. At about the 4:30 mark Tomasz and his comrade become concerned as the stranger becomes agitated. Eventually, the truck moves into a housing estate. Tomasz turns into a dead end street and the stranger climbs out quickly. We later learn that the body of Maja Emja is staying at a hotel in the neighbourhood. She is where she is supposed to be and when she walks away, Tomasz and his friend are sure they have been had. So far the story revolves around a woman in a long black coat, frequently wearing a black or white scarf, and with an umbrella. But then, from out of nowhere, a large wolfman rushes at the truck, knocking them almost over. Zenek jumps out immediately. He climbs back in, using his coat to shield the woman's body from the headlights. The truckdriver speeds to safety but Tomasz and Zenek get caught in the crossfire of the mafioso Vlado. Vlado wipes out his adversaries as the truck and his accomplices turn on their headlights, just in time to see a white car leaving the scene. A truck bringing a "stowaway" (what the crew calls a "rub
